It starts when you look at an animal in the wild and you recognize its beauty. The progression into being truly Nature Aware is when you watch an animal in the wild and realize that it sees your beauty, too.

After a tragedy involving a nuisance animal shooting, author Rick Wood begins to open his eyes to truly see the natural world around him.

Collected from six years' worth of experiences photographing wildlife in Washington State, Nature Aware is at once a stunning pictorial and meaningful narrative about animals and the environment.

The author takes readers along as he gets close to wild foxes, seals, orca and many more incredible animals through anecdotes and amazing photos.

From rafting down a river lined with more than 150 American bald eagles to hiking in the mountains to find one of Washington’s most endangered rodents, Wood’s storytelling puts you right there — in the action.

More than 45 full-color photos help readers understand the majesty of the natural world.

“I never set out to become a nature photographer. It just kind of happened as a by-product of sitting in one spot long enough and quiet enough to let nature come to me.

After being diagnosed with Meniere’s disease in 2004, I started hiking along the shores of Camano Island in an effort to regain my balance and improve my health. I always carried a camera and, as I would soon find out, nature always delivered.” – Excerpt from Nature Aware.
