Today's poem is by Jane Satterfield

Soldierization

A woman can drive a tank across a desert, but what happens when sand shifts, kicks up & dummies the gears? I'm going to bring my brains to this, my brains. Tour of duty's not the same as travel once a convoy's lost & control radio spits back its current of static. A tank can stall across a desert, but there's duty in the absence of orders—skills to be practiced, supplies to be maintained. Foremost is keeping cool. A woman can drive. I remember basic's assault rifle, cadences, kit & camo. Grenades tossed with an easy twist: Victory starts here. As a process, essential, but who sees it coming? poor words, no shelter, no shade. A woman thinks: bullet's arc, sniper flare. Perfect bangs will in a torrent of fire. A hit like a letter, a dream: There is no danger down here (ghastly glimmering of the gods outside & the hollow crashing of the shells) or if any, it will be well over... A desert can drive chronicle & elegy—there's duty in memory's mirror. Brains & brown start here. As a process, essential. Poor words, quiet grave.

Handwritten notes:

- I don't know if anyone thinks like this in an emergency
- The fact like a loaded question - like it's not
- I like the manual crowd in the process than the shift to the normal
- more quantitative judgement here.
- This part fits in the poem - there's a sense of urgency with these lines.
- Perfect bangs will in a torrent of fire - this is a very strong line
- no, I'm pretty sure I don't like this
- judgement call mixed with
- some what clear yet strong image.
