In the middle of the 14th Century, The Great Mortality (or bubonic plague) swept through Afro-Eurasia, resulting in 75-200 million deaths.

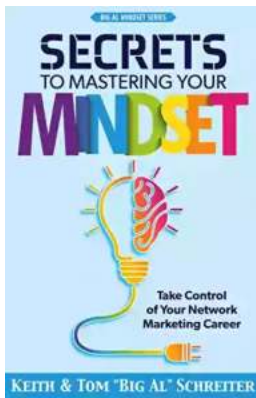

In Scandinavia, a well-known account of this Medieval plague says that many people from Bergen fled into the mountains to a place called Tusededal, hoping to build a new settlement and escape the sickness.

According to John Kelly's The Great Mortality, "months after the pestilence had burned itself out, a rescue party reaching the village found only one survivor, a little girl who had been made so wild by her solitary existence, the rescuers named her Rype — wild bird."

This is her story.

Rype is a work of fiction, inspired by this oft-repeated (possibly mythical) story of the Middle Ages.
